breakthrough in asthma battle

"This is an exciting development, because it means we're another step closer to being able to put a pill-based treatment into clinical trials, not just for asthma but also for other -inflammatory and autoimmune diseases, said Prof Alex Loukas at James Cook University in Australia. "In our initial work on IBD we infected some very committed trial participants with actual hookworms. We established that the protective properties of hookworms lie in their oral secretions.

The protein, AIP-2, was tested on cells from people allergic to dust mites, which are known to trigger asthma. It was found to prevent inflammation and even change pro-inflammatory immune cells into antiinflammatory cells, which can protect the whole body. To survive and remain undetected in the human gut, parasitic worms regulate their human host's immune response, said Dr Severine Navarro

'Although IBD and asthma are very different conditions, what they have in common is a defect in the regulation of the immune system, which results in overwhelming inflammatory processes. "We aim to use that to control the inappropriate inflammation that characterises autoimmune diseases and allergy."
